Recently, you may have heard or read news about the federal government taking action in the form of new legislation on flood insurance from the National Flood Insurance Program.

While much of the news coverage was political in nature, the underlying story was a good reminder about the somewhat unusual nature of flood insurance. Unlike other physical perils to your clients' homes and possessions, damage caused by flooding is not usually covered by a standard homeowners insurance policy.

Once clients understand this important fact, they usually want to know how to insure themselves against flood damage, one of the most common risks to their home, which is one of their most important assets.
